Comments from students

2. Students' views:

1. Savonia UAS
2. Centria
3. Aalto University

Student's view: Savonia

Students' views: Centria

- ✓ Overall the badge is seen as beneficial for students
- ✓ General categories and requirements are considered good
- ✓ Awareness of courses in intercultural competence missing
- ✓ Difficult to spot courses with a global perspective

“For example, IT field does not have easily recognizable courses with global perspective, so there should to be some kind of requirements what the courses should have so it is counted as having global perspective.”

Students' views: Centria

“I think this badge and the whole idea is good. Schools should emphasize more global competence because it's important and this badge, which has many benefits, motivates students to strive for learning.”

“This badge challenges you to investigate the world, and that's cool. During this whole process you will understand the importance of being culturally sensitive and I think that is an important skill. “

If you ask me, it can be difficult to fit all the obligatory language studies and 3 ECTS from intercultural studies in the degree

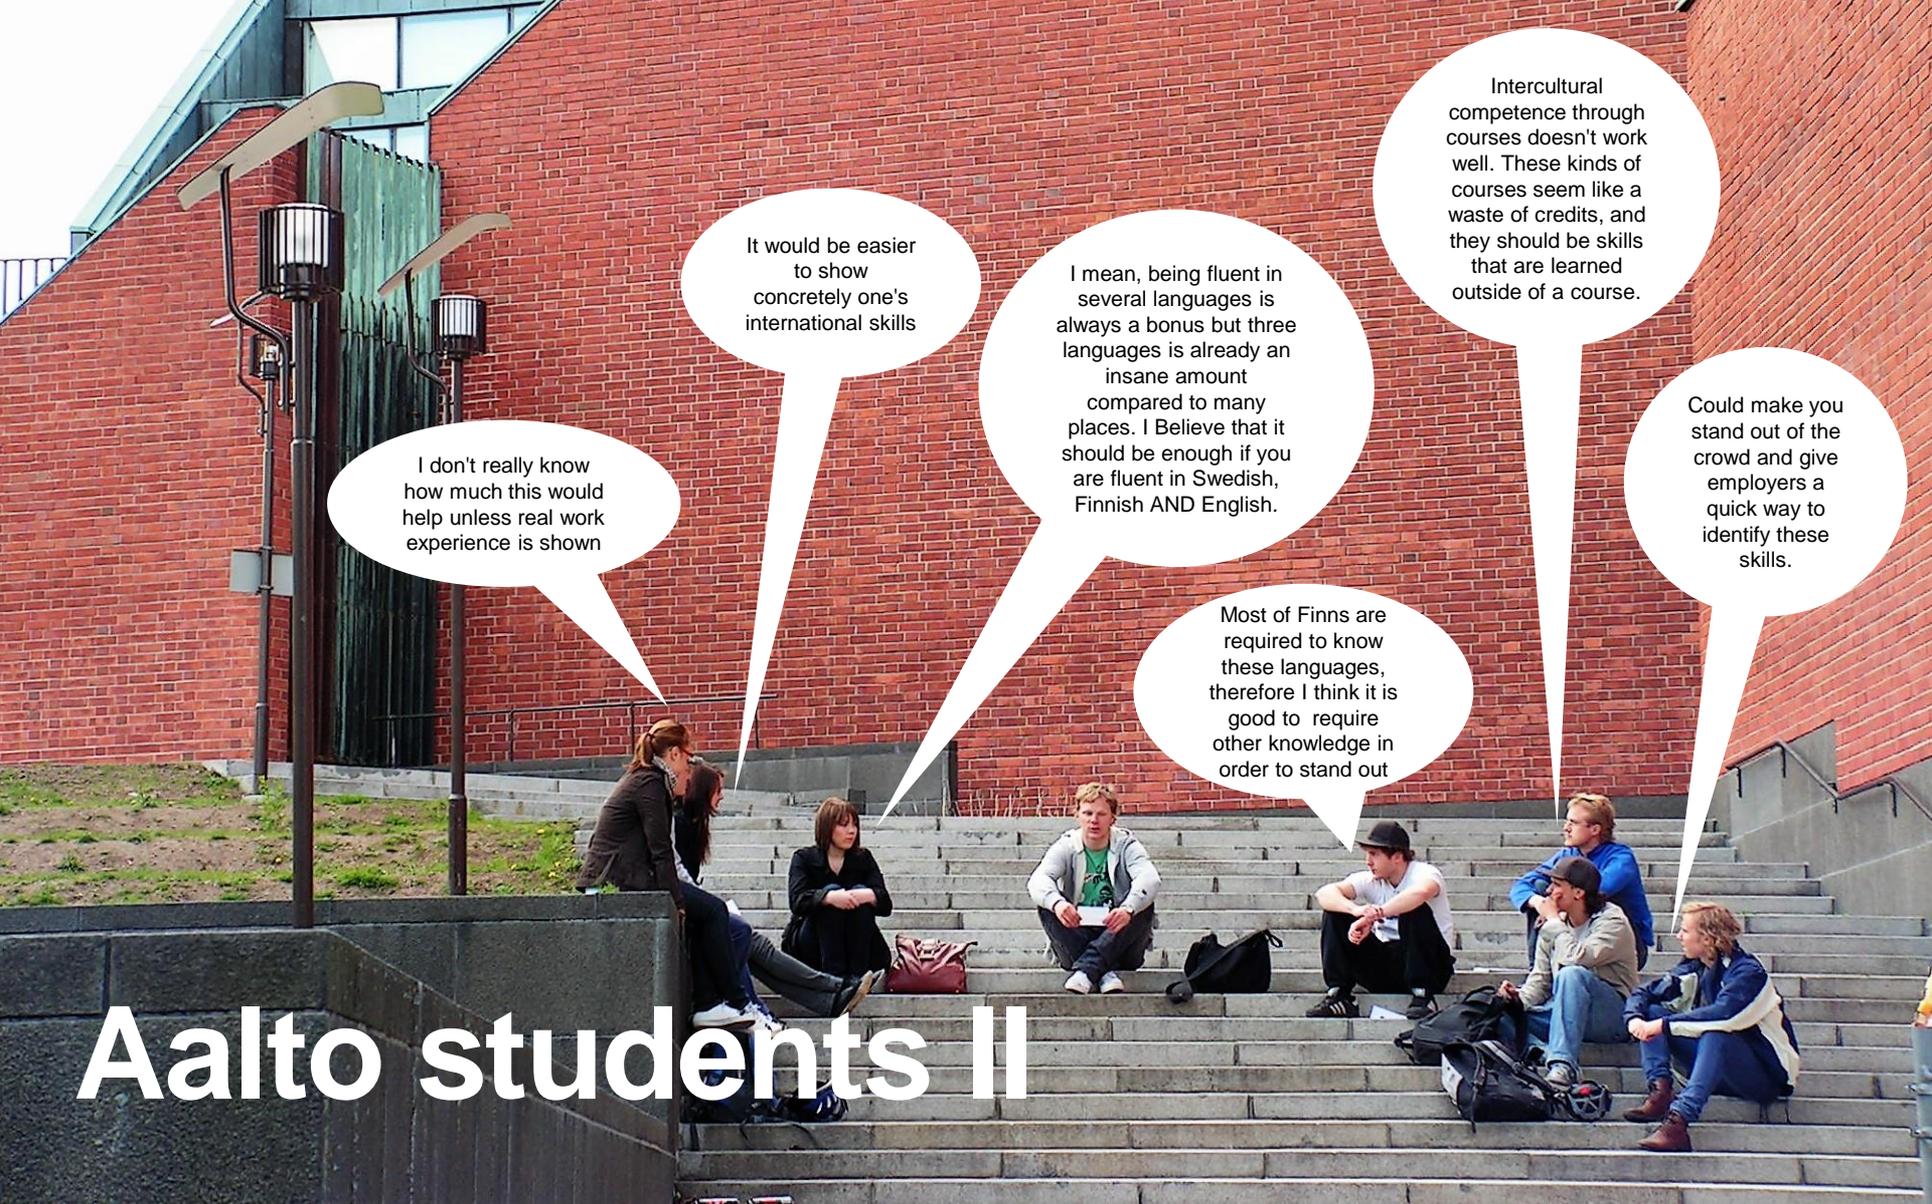

Could be good for the business students?

I think the badge sounds okay but would the HR people really react/appreciate this kind of a badge? Especially in the field of technology and engineering..

How to study mathematics with global perspective?

I like the idea in general but sounds challenging.

Aalto students I

I don't really know how much this would help unless real work experience is shown

It would be easier to show concretely one's international skills

I mean, being fluent in several languages is always a bonus but three languages is already an insane amount compared to many places. I believe that it should be enough if you are fluent in Swedish, Finnish AND English.

Most of Finns are required to know these languages, therefore I think it is good to require other knowledge in order to stand out

Intercultural competence through courses doesn't work well. These kinds of courses seem like a waste of credits, and they should be skills that are learned outside of a course.

Could make you stand out of the crowd and give employers a quick way to identify these skills.
